When the tradie winds blow hard

MANY people realise I am not the most accomplished home handyman. Indeed Ms L contends that the other end of the spectrum is more apt. Alas, now I have even less to support any argument to the contrary.

And while I know you shouldn't try to diminish others for your own self-aggrandisement, Big Brother is probably still a couple of notches ahead – or is that behind? – in the tradie crack-ups.

At least I didn't have to call the manufacturers to fix the do-it-yourself tool shed, and I didn't attempt a concrete garden surround by first laying the cement dust and then adding water.

Furthermore, my latest escapade had an upside – and a few upside-downs too.

All I had to do was chop down one little tree that was already leaning in the right direction, roughly, and physics is a straightforward science, notwithstanding that quantum stuff, all about equal and opposite reactions.

Ms L ran for the video camera as soon as she saw me with a ladder, a piece of rope and a saw. Most uncharitable.

Anyway to cut a long story (and one tree) short, there was ample room between the Hills Hoist and the invaluable lime tree, so removing the clothes from the former seemed unnecessary.

Naturally, that's when the fun started.

The tree hit the line on one corner with such force that it drove it to the ground before slipping off, allowing the equal and opposite force to take over, propelling it back up again.

The clothes on the far side leapt with joy, before the clothes on the near side followed suit, appropriately, in a perfect a Mexican wave mixing whites and coloureds like when I do the washing, most landing back in place, apart from those that ended up with a dash of lime.

The structure itself settled on a jaunty 'Dali' angle.

"I'll put up the new wall-mounted clothesline now, Ms L. Where's the drill?"

Optimiste Shiraz 2006, $20ish. Great name for a use-less tradie and I have a soft spot for unicorns and an equally soft spot for Mudgee shiraz. After years of indulgence I have other soft spots too. 8.6/10.

Oakdene Shiraz 2007, $25ish?

Geelong have been under the pump recently, so get behind the Catters with a bit of Bellarine shiraz as part of your training regime. 8.4/10.

Mount Eyre Hunter Valley Semillon, 2008, $15.

It was such a treat to find a wine with only 10 per cent alcohol, we drank the lot in celebration. Love the Mombassa-esque label too. 8.3/10.

Fox Creek Reserve Shiraz 2006, $70.

More gold medals and oak than you can shake a stick at, so cellar for five years or decant and try again in three hours, and you'll get much more out of it. 8.5/10.

Windance Reserve Cabernet Sauvignon 2007, $50.

It's a marvellous night for a Windance, and my washing-dance Drink with Van Morrison or after a Mexican party. 8.8/10.

Tahbilk Cabernet Sauvignon 2005, $22.

That's as old as Grange, almost. Doesn't taste like Grange either, but it's a cab and you get two dozen of these for one of them. Great value. 8.6/10.
